SWITZERLAND ARMY WITHOUT GENERALS

Army Corps Each Commanded by

BY LA MARQUISE DE FONTENOY. HILE France has for democratic reasons abolished the rank of Field Marshal in her army, Switzerland has gone a step further, and has dispensed with generals, the least of her military officers to hold that rank being old General Dufour, who died many years ago. The various army corps are each of them commanded by colonels, and the defacts of cammander-in-chief and ranking In his letter he says: "I have used Duffy's Pure Malt Whiskey in my family for the last eight years. It is certainly a wonderful remedy for colds, bowel trouble and nervousness. We take it as an allaround household remedy and feel sure it can't be beat." John Agor. throughout his three days stay in the land of the mythical William Tell. If this officer bears the name of Bismarck, in conjunction with that of Willie, it is because in Switzerland the custom prevails for a man to add his wife's patronymic on to his own. Now the better-half of Colonel Ulrich Willie is the Countess Clara Bismarck, daughter of the late General Count Frederick Bismarck, and a cousin of the first Chancellor of the German Empire. The Countess Clara is a daughter of her father's second wife. His first marriage was of a most romantic char-acter. For, as a young subaltern of marriage was of a most remantic character. For, as a young subaltern of cavalry of the Duchy of Nassau, he eloped with his sovereign's daughter. Princess Augusta, just four months after her marriage to Prince Ludwig. Landgrave and ruler of Hesse-Homburg. The latter promptly proceeded to procure a divorca, whereupon the princess married young Count Bismarck. Under ordinary circumstances this would have sufficed to ruin the military career of a young officer; at any rate in Germany. But all Europe was at that time in the throes of the War of Liberation from the thraidom of the first Napoleon, and by the time that Emperor had been deported to St. Helens, Count Frederick Bismarck had managed to attain the rank of General in the Wurtemberg army, and fame as one of the most clever cavalry leaders of his day. So universally acknowledged was his authority in connection with this branch of the military service, that he was invited in turn to organize the cavalry of Prussia. Russia and Denmark, and finally became Envoy of the Kingdom of Wurtemberg in Berlin. His first marriage proved a singularly happy union, and when his royal wife died in 1848, after more than forty years of childless marriage, he contracted a second siliance, with the princess's lady-in-waiting, a Mile. Thibaut, or French birth, at the time about twenty-five years of age, and who at Mariafeld, French birth, at the time about twenty-five years of age, and who still survives, making her home at Mariafeld, one of the most picturesque spots on the Lake of Zurich. There were two children by this second marriage, namely, Count Augustus Bismarck, who is Chamberlain of the Grandduke of Baden, and Countess Clara Bismarck, the wife of Switzerland's "Colonelissimo."

The American "Tailor and Cutter" in its latest issue makes a curious mistak in proposing to celebrate a couple of years hence, that is to say, in 1914, the centenary of trousers. The latter came into fashion, not in the year immediately preceding the Battle of Waterinto fashion, not in the year immediately preceding the Battle of Waterloo, as asserted by the American "Tailor and Cutter," but in 1801, mainly as the result of drink. Old World royalty, and its blue-blooded associates, in those days ate, and especially drank, very heavily, and were consequently afflicted with gout and other maladies of a character to swell the legs. Knee breeches and stockings, so dear not only to the early Presidents of the United States, and to the signers of the Declaration of Independence, but likewise to the old Puritan element of America, were scarcely suitable for swollen limbs, even if they belonged to the Anointed of the Lord; and the result was that George IV. as Prince Regent, his brothers, the Dukes of York, Clarence, Cumberland and Sussex, the French princes who afterwards reigned as Louis XVIII., Charles X. and Louis Philippe, also King Frederick William III., of Prussia and many others equally illustrious personages, adopted the modern form of pantaloon, which was at the time a source of noend of ridicule and entertainment to Gliray, and to other caricaturists of the age. It was not until the fourth decade of the nineteenth century, when heavy drinking by the classes went out of fashion, that an endeavor was decade of the nineteenth century, when heavy drinking by the classes went out of fashion, that an endeavor was made to revive the knee-breeches and the stockings as articles of masculine attire. But the custom of wearing trousers had meanwhile become so universal, that it was found impossible to do away with them, save by the enactment of sumptuary laws, such as Peter the Great was wont to enforce in Russia, but which woud not have ben tolerated in any country farther West. People forgetful of the royal origin of trousers, insisted that they were a symbol of equality and democraorigin of trousers, insisted that they were a symbol of equality and democracy, and that they had a levelling tendency. They declared that the trouser constituted a perpetual and most effectual rebuke to the man who would like to raise himself above his fellows by reason of the shape and form of his legs. The eighteenth century beau, they urged was everlastingly displaying his calves and his ankies, and swaggering about them, with characteristic affectation. A man in those days who had "a good leg," they added, was never tired of showing it, and of arrogating to himself a series superiority on that account, while the general introduction of trousers had given the deathblow to that particular form of masculine vanity, and placed all legs, so to speak, on an equal footing.

This question of masculine nether garments is of far greater importance, not merely from a sociological, but likewing from a political point of view interests.

This question of masculine nether garments is of far greater importance, not merely from a sociological, but likewise from a political point of view, than most people would be willing to believe. Indeed, the fashion in this respect constitutes a very interesting corollary of the history of national enlightment, progress and development. Thus, the absence of clothing for the nether limbs denotes the barbarism of the ages which preceded the Cursades. The breeches made of chain armor and steel plate—very uncomfortable they must have been—followed next, and are associated in our minds with feudalism, tournaments, and the medievalers. The hore and trunks of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries demonstrated that the line arts, the sciences, and in one word, the elegandes of the mind had supplanted might, and rule by the superierty of brute force. The knos-breeches and silk stockings inaugurated in the eighteenth century, may be looked upon as in keeping with an age of courtliness and dignity, while the trouser, alse! is characteristic of a period where men have no leaver time or inclination to devote istic of a period where men have no longer time or inclination ty devote to the cultivation of that "politicate du coeur," which contributes so much to he himself appeared at a court function arrayed as a Highland chieftain, wearing the Stuart tartan, the right to which he claimed as a grandson of Queen Victoria. King George, like his father and grandfather before him, invariably dons the kilt when in Scotland, as do also his boys; and when some years ago the reforming spirits at the War Department suggested the putting of the Highland aggiments, who are the flower of the British army, into trousers, and depriving them of their kilts, all Scotland robe up in arms against this attack on Celtic nationalism; the War Office was obliged to give way, and no further attempt was made to force the abhorred Southern Trews on Sandy.
